With its precarious profile and twisting facades, Vancouver House became an instant icon of Vancouver's skyline. Conceived by architect Bjarke Ingels as an example of Gesamtkunstwerk, a total work of art, the pixelated tower rises from its narrow context among on-ramps and bridge supports, anchoring workspaces, retail, hospitality, shops, and more. Vancouver House boasts some of the most dramatic views in the city. The building residences offer drama aplenty, too - from kitchen islands that appear to levitate to the copper cladding that shimmers with reflected light. Dialog worked with Kentwood's product team to create a custom herringbone floor finished in natural brushed oak for the penthouse suites. The flooring adds a classic element to the bold, futuristic vision of the building and the sweeping natural beauty of its setting.
